Wikipedia Microsite: Mockup Review

Leslie Liu
Nov 28, Saturday 2020
609 635 5346
liuleslie@wustl.edu

Hi Tina,

Really digging the look so far—especially appreciate how prominent the Uncyclopedia potato is. A few thoughts and potential changes:

+ Rather than the light gray bar below the overview, I think a rule (the one that you used to delineate the subheadings of Content (article, subprojects, traditions) is enough. Perhaps the larger section rule could be a bit thicker.

+ I wonder instead of the rule around "article," "subprojects" and "traditions", we could have the font size a bit smaller to create that visual hierarchy?

+ In terms of the background, I have an iffy relationship with material honesty/dishonesty—let's try to look for a solid color that doesn't imitate the texture of paper. Or if you'd like to add some texture, perhaps an even fine grain texture set to overlay? Not too sure how to add the grain—if it's more work than it's worth feel free to just have the background color be a solid shade, no texture.

+ A note on responsiveness: don't think I included this in the original content overview/brief, but would like to have the columns collapse when less than roughly 480px: so that it's all one column (feel free to play around with this width)

+ In terms of buttons, I think we could either do an outline or just the plain text, and have hover actions show that it's a button. My main concern right now is that buttons with more text (such as the last links for See Also and External Links) are difficult to read as the text is a bit squished.

Thanks, let me know if you have any questions—excited for this.

Cheers,

L